Burroughs, of Orleans: In Assembly, Jan, 25 and Feb, 13, 1850, on the Resolutions Relating to the Subject of Slavery The speech of that gentleman was to the effect that no congressional action was demanded by the present emergency, and that it might do mischievous! There is the text and here is the. Commentary. There is but little correspondence. I supposed that it was the duty of him who treats on any subject to see that his commentary agreed with the text. The gentleman seems determined that if his text should go to Washington, its force must be blunted, - if the arrow is sent, its barbs must be first broken - and the poisoned dart must be dipped in milk and water. And he assigns as a reason that measures have been taken in several Southern States to dissolve the Union. And we should approach them with kind and conciliatory words. Language of submission, I suppose, it necessary, to save the Union from threatened dismemberment. Have I mistaken the spirit of the gentleman's speech If I have not, the substance and intent of that speech was to this effect We are obliged to be in the fashion at home; we must send a message to Congress expressing the Opinions of the people. But that it may do the one no good and the other no harm, we will send our commentary along to deprive our message of its force and meaning, and save for ourselves the Order of nationality. This is the plain English of the whole speech in a few words. About the...
